FOREWORD.

Perhaps few departments of the state government have experienced the rapid growth which has characterized the office of the Attorney General of Ohio. This office was created in 1846, when one lawyer left his private practice two or three days a week to serve as Attorney General, and when an average of ten working days was required to prepare one opinion. Even in the late years of the 19th century, when special counsel were added as assistants to the Attorney General, all work of the department was done in one of the rooms now occupied by the budget commission.

Prior to the passage of the McKinnon Act in 1898, legal work of each state department was done by lawyers retained by the department, who had no relation whatever to the Attorney General. By the enactment of this law, the Legislature placed all legal work of the state in the hands of the Attorney General, requiring also that he should represent and give counsel to all officials, departments, boards, and commissions of the state government as well as to the prosecuting attorneys of the various counties. The work has grown so that now the full time of twenty-four lawyers and fourteen clerks and stenographers is required in rendering nearly 1400 opinions in a year, in addition to handling all litigation for state officials, boards and commissions.

The wise provisions of the McKinnon law give Ohio a most economical system of government, so far as its law work is concerned. There is no spreading about of easy jobs. All law work is done in one office at comparatively little expense. Thus when Ohio created a new commission—the State Office Building Commission—all legal work, in acquiring the site by negotiation, and all litigation which developed to further or to interfere with the project was attended to by the Attorney General and his existing staff without any increased expense to the taxpayers of Ohio.

Provision for adequate working facilities has not kept pace with the rapid growth of work in the Attorney General's office. For several years, as many as four men were required to occupy the same office. Necessarily, if one were dictating, conducting a conference, or talking over the telephone, all others were disturbed. Efficiency was thus impaired. Now additional space has been secured, so that this office occupies a part of the basement floor as well as that part of the first floor of the statehouse annex which has been occupied by this department for more than twenty years. Although not yet adequate, the new quarters have reduced the number of lawyers working in a single office to two, library facilities are increased, and provision has been made for quiet study.

Economic depression creates a strain on the governmental fabric from township to state, which strain seems sooner or later to find its way to the office of the Attorney General. Work seems to have tripled this year, but my colleagues and I, appreciating the necessity of governmental economy from bottom to top, are trying to carry the load without additional help.

Attorney General.

December 1, 1931.
